Specific Case Highlights: Established in 2004, Chinatown Partnership is a nonprofit that was formed to bring residents, business owners, and community groups together to rebuild the Chinatown district after September 11th. Chinatown Partnership designs, implements, and manages economic development projects intended to preserve the neighborhood’s unique culture, while ensuring its future vitality.

In addition to cultural and business initiatives, Chinatown Partnership also seeks to improve its neighborhood’s physical environment. One such project is the Clean Streets program, which is designed to work with residents and neighborhood business owners to make the district a cleaner, more attractive place to conduct business. In May 2011, Chinatown Partnership approached Lawyers Alliance for assistance with securing a public-access solar-powered trash compactor, known as “BigBelly,” aimed at decreasing the amount of garbage in the neighborhood’s streets.

Corporate attorney Emily Goodman Binick of American Express Company volunteered to assist Chinatown Partnership in negotiating an agreement with Direct Environmental Inc. to pilot test BigBelly. In November, Chinatown Partnership and community leaders, including Councilmember Margaret Chin and District Manager Susan Stetzer, unveiled the pilot compactor. Consisting of a computer and smartphone and powered by renewable solar energy, BigBelly securely stores up to five times the amount of garbage as a conventional trash container thus decreasing rodent infestation. Additionally, it reduces collection frequency substantially by notifying its nearest headquarters when it is full. The result is potentially a cleaner, more efficient Chinatown.

Chinatown Partnership’s executive director Wellington Chen praised Emily Goodman Binick, noting that she was “fabulous and did a very thorough job.” He added that not only did Ms. Binick complete the work “with a high degree of meticulous detail,” but that she took an interest in the organization’s work and neighborhood as she helped arrange a tour of Chinatown for her and her colleagues.
